

Pets are the friendliest creatures you can have who will be the closest to your heart throughout your life. Raising them well with love and care is like raising your own child.

You need to take care of them, ensuring they eat well, their health is fine, and in return, they endow you with the most precious and cherishable moments and memories of your life. So, just like little innocent children, your cat, too, can show some unfavorable behavioral patterns.

But, there is always a solution to every problem. And in the following discussion, we will be discussing the various factors relating to this behavior of your old cat hissing at the new kitten.

So, follow the given discussion to learn the reasons and prevention ways of this behavior of your cat. Without much delay, let us get started with our discussion.

First, let us understand the possible reasons why your old cat is hissing at the new kitten. It is important to know, for this will help you understand the proper causation and how your cat's mind functions. As a result, you will tackle this problem more effectively and effortlessly.

So, here are the reasons why your old cat is hissing at the new kitten.

You may be aware that cats are known to be an animal controlling by nature. They are not quite a lover of changes and thus, act quite disruptively when they face changes. When you adopt or introduce a new kitten, it automatically changes the house, which is the environment of your old cat.

Firstly, the new kitten is a new addition to the life and environment of your old cat; this becomes a great change, which, as we know, cats are not comfortable with.

Also, it brings changes in their regular habits or the patterns in which they conduct themselves. Such a change doesn't appeal to them, which creates anxiousness, irritation, confusion, and thus, aggression. And as a result of this, our old cat hisses at the new kitten.

As we told you earlier, your pets are like your children, and at the same time, your pets, too, consider you as someone very close. So, when you bring a new kitten, you tend to share your love and time with it as well.

It leads you to cut off the time and attention you used to give to your old cat. It is becoming quite disturbing for your old cat, as it should be. It makes your old cat feel frustrated, and thus, it hisses at the new kitten.

Recommended read:

1. Here's why does your cat swat at you

When the cats find someone similar to them, they become aggressive because they see the other kitten as their competitor. So, check whether your new kitten and old cat have too much in common.

It can be their gender, color, size, or other characteristic features. But, if your old cat finds the new kitten similar to it, it might be considered a threat or a competitor in the environment which was previously his. And this can be the reason why your old cat is hissing at the new kitten.

You may not have been riveting a new cat pad or bed that makes it to sleep or use the cat pad or bed of your old cat. And your old cat does not want to share its belongings with the new kitten. As a result, your old cat becomes angry and aggressive and is hissing at your new kitten.

Also, even after providing your new kitten with a separate bed, it creates the same anger and aggression in your old cat as it does not want to share its belongings. Thus, resulting in your old cat hissing at your new kitten.

Also read:

1. Know more about cats walking around in circles

Now that we have discussed the different reasons why your old cat is hissing at your new kitten, it is crucial to know about the remedies to this problem as well. The following list offers the different ways to prevent your older cat from hissing at your kitten.

One of the easiest ways to prevent your older cat from hissing at your new kitten is by ensuring that you do not leave your older cat unattended. You might be excited about bringing your new kitten but do not cut off the time that you used to give your older kitten.

It is understandable and obvious that you will not be able to give your older kitten the time you used to before, but the difference should not be so huge that it affects your older cat.

This remedy might sound strange, but it is in the nature of cats to be protective towards their position, power, and place in their surroundings. Since you are introducing a new kitten to the surroundings, which solely belongs to your older cat, it might get protective and, thus, aggressive.

Initially, a few swats and hisses are normal. If it prolongs or intensifies, do interfere by separating the two. And then, by and by, as your older cat gets used to your kitten being around him, the hissing behavior will eventually stop.

It is a very crucial remedy. As much as you encourage your kitten to stay around your older cat and spend time together, your older cat will get used to having the kitten around quicker. It helps in decaying the hissing behavior, and they might also form a good bond.

Since it was your older cat's place before, it is important to feel so. Otherwise, it might get protective of its position and thus, become aggressive. So, the hissing will continue.

Yes, it is absolutely normal for your older cat to hiss at the new kitten. Your older cat might be protective because he sees the new kitten as its competitor. It is also very common among cats because they are controlling in nature.

There are various other reasons that justify that the behavior of your older cat hissing at your kitten is normal. But, you must take it under consideration if the hissing prolongs and intensifies.

If everything goes fine, your older cat will stop hiding in a day or two. But, the maximum time till which your older cat should stop hissing at your new kitten is three weeks. After this, you might need to take effective measures.

Also read:

1. Ways to brush a cat that hates it

These were the different factors related to your older cat hissing at your new kitten. There is nothing to worry about this behavior, for this is quite common.

The remedies mentioned above will help you ensure that your older cat stops hissing at your new kitten as soon as possible. With that being said, enjoy your time with your precious cats and make great memories!

Hi There, AJ Oren here. I am the founder of this amazing pet blog & a passionate writer who loves helping pet owners to learn more about their pets through my articles. I am also the content manager of this blog. I have experience in pet training and behavior, sheltering, and currently working for a veterinary clinic.

Contents

- 1 Older cat hissing at new kitten: Here's why
  - 1.1 Cats do not like changes
  - 1.2 Jealousy
  - 1.3 Your cat finds the new kitten similar to itself
  - 1.4 Your old cat does not want to share
- 2 How do I get my older cat to stop hissing at my kitten?
  - 2.1 Try to attend to your older cat as much as you can
  - 2.2 Try not to interfere as much as possible
  - 2.3 Ensure that your cat and the kitten spends time together
  - 2.4 Allow your older cat to feel superior
- 3 Is it normal for an older cat to hiss at a new kitten?
- 4 How long will it take for my cat to stop hissing at my new kitten?

Some planning must go into the process of introducing a kitten to an older cat. Friendly, single adult cats can have trouble adjusting to living with a new kitten. Often times the older cats will appear sad, reclusive, hiss a lot, and sometimes even stop eating or start urinating in strange places if it isn't adjusting well to the new member of the family.

These behaviors occur because cats do not like change, especially when it involves their established territory. Introducing a kitten to an adult cat can cause a lot of stress in your household, but there are some things you can do to help make the introduction go more smoothly.

Preparation is the key to a successful introduction of a new kitten to your older cat. If you prepare your cat for the new arrival and make the changes seem less drastic, then it is more likely to adapt to its new roommate. Give yourself (and your older cat) plenty of time to prepare for this adjustment with these steps.

Pheromones are useful for creating a calm environment for any cat. The weeks before the arrival of a new kitten is a great time to make use of them. Diffusers, sprays, and wipes are all available and help your cat feel relaxed without the use of drugs. Try using pheromones for at least a few weeks before bringing home a kitten.

If you suspect your older cat will become stressed and anxious with a new kitten, consider nutritional supplements that are designed to calm a cat. These won't drug your pet but will help it remain calm and relaxed. They typically work best if given a few weeks prior to the anticipated stressful event and can be continued after the new kitten arrives. The ingredients usually include L-theanine, Phellodendron, magnolia, whey or milk proteins, and other natural ingredients shown to be safe and effective for pets.

Your veterinarian is a great resource when it comes to recommending safe and effective calming supplements. There are a ton of "calming products" out there today. Check with her before starting your pet on any supplement to make sure it is worth the time and money!

New items for your kitten, such as food bowls, beds, another litter box, and toys, should be placed in and around your home before the kitten comes home. Start putting these items in their new places about a week before the new arrival so your adult cat can smell them and get used to all the new things. If you can, try to include items that have the scent of the kitten on them already. Make sure you are ready for the kitten. If you are stressed out and unprepared, your older cat will be able to tell and be negatively affected by it.

Designate a small room, such as a bathroom, for your new kitten to retreat to and spend the first week or so in. Your older cat should be able to get to the door of this room in order to hear and smell them, but not have any interaction with the kitten. Place the kitten's belongings in this room (such as a litter box and food bowls) along with a toy that belongs to your older cat.

Cats are typically stressed by limited access to resources. Resources include food, water, litter boxes, prime perching spots, and you. There should be a litter box for each cat PLUS an additional litter box, and these boxes should be distributed throughout the house. Cats typically do not want to cross paths with another cat when attempting to access a resource, so keep this in mind when placing resources throughout the house. Remember it is a good idea to start using pheromones and calming supplements PRIOR to making any changes in your house as this process alone has been known to cause stress-related illnesses in cats.

Make sure your older cat is healthy. Added stress to an unhealthy cat will only make things worse and you want your cat not only mentally prepared for a new kitten but also physically ready to handle it. Take your cat in for a checkup with your vet to make sure it is healthy and that its vaccinations are current. Respiratory diseases are common in kittens and you'll want your older cat's immune system to be ready to tackle anything that comes into the house. In case scratching or biting occurs between the cat and kitten, you'll also want the rabies vaccine up to date to avoid any problems.

Keeping the cats separated for at least 10-14 days is also a great way to avoid spreading any possible contagious illness, like upper respiratory infections.

It is also important to know your cat and the kitten's Feline Leukemia (FeLV) and Feline immunodeficiency virus (FIV) status prior to introduction. Your veterinarian can help guide you in the recommended testing that should occur prior to the introduction of any new cat into a home.

While older cats will occasionally take to a new kitten right away, they typically need a little time to adjust to the changes. Sometimes cats never fully accept a new kitten but will simply coexist, keeping to themselves away from the other cat in the house. You'll want to make sure that no matter how your cat feels about the new kitten, that things stay peaceful and you have the best chance at creating a budding friendship from the start.

When you bring your kitten home, allow your cat to sniff it while the kitten is in a carrier. Go directly to the room previously designated and set up for your new kitten and allow the kitten to explore. The litter box, food bowls, bed, and some toys should all be easily accessible. Do not let your older cat have immediate access to the kitten.

At night, when you are not home, and whenever you are unable to supervise the kitten and your older cat, keep the kitten in its designated room with the door closed. As your cat gets curious, it may stick its paw under the door, sniff under the door, and listen to the kitten. Do this for about a week, depending on how your cat is acting with the changes. Don't forget to provide a lot of attention to your older cat after playing with your kitten. Just wash your hands between play sessions to avoid spread of infections at first. It'll need your attention and support and the scent of the kitten on your clothing will help it get used to the newcomer.

After about a week, let your kitten explore the house under your watchful eye. Allow your older cat to observe this exploration and retreat if it wants to. Do not force interaction between your cat and kitten. If your cat has a favorite interactive toy, such as a feather wand or laser pointer, try playing with both cats at the same time. This will encourage mutual activity. You can also give them both treats at the same time and feed them at the same time from separate bowls. Be sure to leave enough space between the food bowls so your older cat does not feel threatened.

Encourage any positive interactions your older cat has with the kitten using praise, treats, and physical affection. You want your cat to associate the kitten with happy, positive things.

Cats need to have order and a new member in the home must learn the rules. Your older cat may have a period of time when it tries to establish boundaries with the new kitten. Your older cat may hiss and swat at the kitten when the newcomer does something unfavorable. This is completely normal and as long as it is just hissing and swatting, do your best to not interfere. Your older cat is teaching the kitten where its boundaries as the new cat are.

They may never turn out to be best friends, but most cats learn to accept and occasionally appreciate the presence of another feline roommate. Don't give up if the first encounters are not positive. Older cats can take time to acclimate to a younger cat. A common mistake is to rush the socialization between cats and then getting mad or frustrated when it doesn't work out. Keep calm and work in increments to bring the cats together. Try timing your interactions and slowly increasing the amount of time together. If your older cat is especially aggressive toward the new kitten, speak with your vet or a behavior specialist for tips.

If your kitten is hissing at your older cat (Click here to see my best solution for this, on Amazon #Ad), then you may be wondering why it's happening and how to stop it.

To stop your kitten from hissing at your older cat you need to distract her with a cat toy, then in time, she will slowly learn to trust the older cat. You can also try to separate them but it is difficult to implement and most homes cannot accommodate it.

Description Image My Rating 01. Youngever toys (Best choice) Click here for the price on Amazon #Ad

02. Hipipet kitten toy set Click here for the price on Amazon #Ad

03.

Dono kitten toy set Click here for the price on Amazon #Ad

Now that you know what you need to do to stop your kitten from hissing. Keep reading to learn why it's happening, three ways to stop it, the problems with these other solutions, and much more.

A striped kitten sitting on a bed.

You may be wondering why your kitten is acting like this in the first place. Therefore, in this section, I will give you some ideas about why this is happening.

The chances are your kitten is upset for these reasons:

- Fear
- Anxiety
- Missing her mother

Any new kitten will undoubtedly miss her mother. Not just her, but her siblings. I mean, wouldn't you? This is made worse when an unknown cat is placed in front of her. This makes her fearful and anxious.

And, her natural defense against this is hissing, to give a signal that she does not want to be approached. The reality is, in time, she will adjust and settle. So, you just need a method to control her in the short term (more on this later).

Now that you know why she is acting like this you are probably keen to understand a way to stop this from happening. Therefore, in this section, I will give you a few solutions.

1. Distract your hissing kitten with a toy (the best option)
2. Separate the two cats completely
3. Let them feed together (but monitor them)

This is by far the best option. It requires you to distract your hissing kitten with a simple toy (look below for my best ones). This will redirect her energy to a positive activity. Then, in time, she will start to feel comfortable around your older cat, are you with me?

With this method, you need to completely separate your two cats. It means there is no way your kitten can get anxious if she can't see him, right?

The issue I have with this is it's almost impossible to implement. Unless you live in a mansion with a completely different isolated area. And, even then, they still may get curious and bump heads.

Also, it does not address the root cause, it avoids it. Ultimately, you want them to become friends, right?

The theory with this method is, that if they feed together, they will appreciate each other. And, if you can get it working, it's golden. It needs to get them slowly eating together. This is done by gradually moving their food dishes together, as you monitor them.

The issue with this method is, that it's hard to get it started. They will inevitably get anxious and may even fight, which you do not want.

You shouldn't just allow your kitten to run around your house when, up until that point, your older cat has been the head of the household. Instead, there is an introductory process that is recommended to make sure both cats feel safe and don't become too overwhelmed.

If your older cat is in a relaxed mood, they are less likely to be reactive once they notice the new kitten. Try spending some time alone with the older cat, having some dedicated play time or cuddles before bringing the new kitten in to see them.

If you have an overly anxious cat, there are pheromone sprays and wipes that you can use with your older cat for a few weeks before bringing the kitten home. These are cat-safe, and the pheromones keep your cat calm and happy.

You should have your home completely set up for your new arrival before they are home. Have a food and water bowl for the kitten, but not right beside the older cat's so the two don't fight over food. Your new kitten should also have a bed and a few toys just for them.

Your older cat should have a chance to sniff around these new items. They might not like them as much as the new ones. These

- No catnip provided
- The tunnels do not have that fun crinkle sound

This selection of cat toys comes in a set with a large variety of toys that most kittens will love. I love it because there are so many, it encourages your cats to play together.

As well as this, it will keep them active and good exercise, especially if they are indoor cats. The range of toys is quite broad, from a cat tunnel (Click here for the best connectable cat tunnels) to a little cute mouse that your kitten will love.

It is easy to store it away when you no longer need it. And, it also helps you bond with your cats while you play with them.

In summary, if you are looking for a cat toy set that will distract your kitten, with a wide range to choose from, you will need to check this out.

Like anything, nothing is perfect. Firstly, I was hoping there would be some catnip thrown in, but unfortunately not. Also, more of a wish than an issue is the tunnel. I just wish it made that cool crinkle sound when your cat walks on it, are you with me?

Click here for the price on Amazon #Ad

- Non-toxic materials used
- Over 20 toy pieces
- Environmentally friendly dye colors
- Cat-friendly dye coloring
- Keeps your kitten distracted

- No catnip provided
- The tunnel could be bigger

This cat toy set looks cool, in particular, the blue-looking tunnel it comes with. I am happy to read that it does not use toxic material, which is reassuring. Also, they claim that the dyes used are cat-friendly as well as eco-friendly, yay!

Ultimately, I love the variety of over 20 cat toys. This selection will keep your kitten and cat happy. And, it won't be long until they play together as friends.

In summary, if you are looking for a large selection of cat toys that uses non-toxic materials, this sounds like the one for you.

The size of the cat tunnel is a bit small, in my opinion. It's not the end of the world to be fair, but I just feel that it could be bigger, are you with me?

Click here for the price on Amazon #Ad

- 21 cat toy pieces
  - Increases the bond between your cats
  - Keeps her active (form of exercise)
  - Cool looking Leopard cloth toy
  - Sisal woven mice
-
- The tunnel could be a bit bigger
  - The toy wand is a bit flimsy

This offering by Dono is quite eye-catching, in my opinion. Not sure if it's because of the cat tunnel or the selection of colors used. Either way, it works.

Like the other sets, it has over 20 toys to keep your cats happy and bonding together. I love the leopard cloth toy, in particular, it is a good size and design and most kittens will chance this around for ages.

Also, the sisal mouse should keep your older cat active as well. Cats love sisal, it's the material often used on scratching posts or cat trees (click here to see my best cat tree for your cat).

In summary, if you are looking for a cat toy set that comes with a quirky leopard cloth toy and a sisal mouse, this sounds like a good match for you.

This set comes with a toy wand. It looks good, but it's a bit flimsy, in my opinion. maybe you will be fine with it. Also, regarding the cat tunnel, I just feel that it could be a bit longer.

A kitten may hiss or growl at you for several reasons but one of the top reasons is aggression while playing. This is typically caused by rough playing, or play fighting. The game starts fun then escalates out of control and ends with a hissy cat.

This is one of the reasons why this type of gameplay with your cat is not ideal or encouraged. Kittens in particular find it hard to understand the boundaries of play and a genuine attack.

Your kitten may hiss at its mother for quite a few reasons but one of the common issues is confusion with scent. this can happen if the mother cat is an outdoor cat and has an extended period outdoors.

When this happens it could pick up another scent and result in one, or more of its kittens hissing because they are struggling to identify her.

For example, one cat owner reported that his mother cat was an outdoor cat and when it was put back into the home the kittens were confused and hissed at their mother.

If you have a new kitten, and an existing resident kitten they are likely to hiss when they first meet. This is because they do not know each other and establishing who is the dominant one and if the other kitten can be trusted.

This is regarded as normal but even if it is you still need to monitor them and it's not recommended to leave them together unsupervised.

An older cat can bond with a kitten but it's not guaranteed. Some get along fine with time, others will get along right away, and you have some that will never really get along.

That being said, even the ones that do not get along could still coexist, they may just not interact much, if at all. But, if there is any aggression, you need to keep monitoring them and do not leave them unsupervised.

You can't keep your cat from hissing at the kitten – although if you introduce them carefully, you can certainly minimize the amount of time that it takes your cat to adjust. For introductions, you'll want to get a place carrier pier, so that when you introduce them you can let your older cat safely sniff the kitten.

Even better, if you can wait a day to introduce them, you can keep the cat in another room and switch out their bedding so that they can smell each other before safely meeting with the crate. Beyond this, it's a matter of supervising them and providing treats, play, and affection and giving a little extra to the older cat.

It can take a little time, but your older cat will relax and accept the kitten, and with a little luck, they might even decide to be friends.

A white kitten peeking from a wall.

While there are no guarantees, most cats will eventually warm up to a new kitten, it's mostly just a matter of time and your cat's personality. The best way to help things along is to reduce the number of ways that the kitten might accidentally irritate the older cat.

Exs o °

You can also use a little science trick in the form of pheromone sprays. Groomers use these sometimes, and pheromone sprays produce hormones that relax cats and can help to improve the general mood. Just keep in mind that there is no guarantee that your cat will ever like the new kitten.

That said, if you help out by making it easier for your cat's daily routine to be performed uninterrupted, then they might just relax a bit and start interacting more with the kitten.

Mostly it's a matter of creating experiences that your older cat enjoys, where the kitten just happens to be nearby. Cats tend to build up an internal database of happy associations and bad associations. That's why when your cat sees a towel, they immediately fled because they associate it with a bath.

If you supervise all meetings and spoil your older cat with the kitten around, then eventually they'll associate these good times with both you and the new kitten in the house. Just be persistent and patient and see what happens. While there are no guarantees, most cats can and will adjust.

The best thing to do is to give your cat some space. If you are introducing a new kitten, don't force it, and keep in mind that hissing and swatting will be normal as a part of introductions.

Your cat feels that the home is theirs, and they will want to establish their dominance over the new kitten, and they are quite normal. As long as they aren't actually hurting each other, just keep an eye on things and try to break the tedium with some tossed treats or toys in-between hisses.

Be patient and let them get to know each other and with a little luck, your cat will start to relax and become more open to the new kitty.

Hissing Kitten Grows Up To Be A Foster Dad | The Dodo Cat Crazy

To better understand this behavior, let's take a look at how domestic cats interact in the wild. In a feral state, cats live in social groups and know who is a member of their group. Members of the group often help each other. For example, if a big, male cat who is a stranger approaches, he may be considered a danger to any youngsters in the group, since non-group males have been known to kill kittens if they can get to them. Both the Queens and the Toms who are members of the group may attack the strange male to defend the kittens. If the new male wants to become a member of the group, it will likely require weeks or months of his peaceably and patiently hanging around the periphery of the group's area. He will have to gradually interact with the adults and show that he is not a danger to the group's well-being before he has a chance of being accepted as a member.

Sometimes a hiss may be confused with a growl. Growling and hissing are natural behaviors, and both help your cat to communicate. A hiss occurs with the mouth wide open and teeth showing. It is a forceful breath out, with a hard stop. A growl often starts with an mmmm sound and then becomes low and long, with the sound originating in the throat.

An angry-looking cat with its claws and nails out.

Cats may take around 7-10 days to get familiar with the other cat. Yet, if it takes more than 7 days, you may want to let them mingle a little bit with some physical constraints and for a shorter duration. This will help them feel familiar with each other.

You can also give them some treats and encourage them to be friendly with each other.

Read Also: Is Blue Buffalo Good Cat Food

So far, I have covered the reasons why your cat might hiss at your new kitten. However, most likely, you are also seeking some advice to help resolve the issue. The good news is, there are some simple steps you can follow to minimize the conflict and ensure the two cats eventually settle and become peaceful companions.

One of the best things you can do in the early stages is establish a safe room for the new kitten. This room should be secure, so the older cat cannot access it, allowing the cats to be separated when necessary. A baby gate can be an ideal solution for keeping the cats separate, because it protects the kitten, while simultaneously allowing the cat to see and smell the kitten, and get used to its presence within the household.

A carrier can also be an invaluable tool, allowing your cat to become familiar with your new kitten while keeping them apart. Again, as with the baby gate idea, this allows both cats to see each other and pick up on each other's scent. It also ensures the kitten does not accidentally impose upon the cat's boundaries too early.

Over time, you should allow the cat and the kitten to spend more time together. They should always be supervised and you should be ready to step in if the cat becomes too aggressive, or if there are other unwanted behaviours.

Cats each have different temperaments and personalities so it is normally expected that hissing and altercation will occur during the arrival of a new cat. However, this can be fixed with the help of a proper introduction coupled with lots of patience on your part. Getting two unrelated cats that both come from different environments and backgrounds to become used to each other is not done overnight but it is achievable.

Read Also: How To Draw A Realistic Kitten

Your cat may be hissing at the new cat because she feels that her territory has been invaded by an outsider. This is prevalent among cats that are used to being the only feline in the household. This is also often observed among unneutered and unspayed cats. An unwillingness to share her space may also mean that your cat was undersocialized or had unhappy experiences with other cats when she was younger. This territorial behavior can be addressed by providing separate resources for the two cats which include their food and water bowls, beds, and litter boxes.

While cat hissing is pretty normal and is nothing to be concerned about. However, if cat hissing is more frequent, you should get a bit careful and observe what is making your cat hiss and remove the cause. If your cat is still hissing, you should contact your vet and take her for a checkup.

Always keep in mind that cats are stoic creatures. Meaning that they do not let the world, even their loved ones, get an idea about their sickness and weakness. Therefore, if your cat is hissing frequently, she is probably in extreme pain. So without wasting any time, you should immediately take her to the vet.

near the door of the cats room so he associates it with good things.

- Put your dog in the bedroom and let the cat roam. This lets him explore and get exercise. Then put your cat back in his room and let the dog walk around and smell the new cat without having to see him. This is a great way to get them used to each others scent.
- Reward obedience on the dogs part with a treat.
- If possible, allow the animals to observe each other while separated with a baby gate or screened door. Keeping the dog in a crate while the cat is allowed to safely observe the dog is one way to help the cat acclimate to the dogs presence.

Recommended Reading: Blue Wilderness Kitten Food Reviews

Hissing is almost always a sign that a cat that feels mistreated, provoked, insecure, uncomfortable, threatened, or pressured in some way.

The common misconception is that the cat that hisses is teasing or taunting the other cat, dog, or person. In actuality, hissing is often a signal that the cat wants to avoid a physical confrontation. In cat-to-cat behavior, the cat that hisses regularly is almost always the victim or the one being chased or antagonized.

Common scenarios for cats to hiss at each other include:

- A female cat with a litter of kittens may hiss, growl, chase, swat, or try to bite another cat who approaches, even one she was formerly friendly with.
- Two unneutered male cats or an unneutered male and an intact female commonly hiss at each other when they are looking for mates.
- Cats are territorial and will hiss at other cats to assert dominance, especially when a new cat is introduced to their surroundings.
- After a trip to the vet, it is common for the returning cat to be picked on and hissed at by their housemates. Cats communicate through sight, sound, and scent.
- Cats will hiss to redirect aggression or when they anticipate pain.

You can bond your cat with your new kitten by encouraging their play time together, rewarding their decent behavior towards each other, by once in a while playing with them and keeping them known to each other.

Remember, that they should feel like bonding with each other, you cannot act as a driving force between them.

In the initial stages, you need to know that their cat is in denial state and would take some days to sit well with the fact that there is somebody else going to be there to divert your attention towards them.

Think of the new kitten too as it would also take some time to befriend you, the environment, and to know a friend who seem to not like its presence in the house.

Once all of this settles, you can reintroduce them again.

You May Like: What Does Cat Spray Smell Like

Cats make great companions for seniors. To avoid accidental scratching or nipping, its important they learn how to properly hold and pet a cat. They should also learn basic cat body language so they will know to leave the cat alone when his ears are back, his tail is twitching or he is growling or hissing.

With continued persistence, you will eventually learn whether the personalities of the cat and puppy are likely to mesh and become friendly.

Most of the time, cats will retract their early aggressiveness and live in harmony with the pup. Before you leave them together alone however, you do need to make sure that the puppy will behave in the presence of the cat and not chase after it in a frenzy.

While introducing a new puppy to a resident aggressive cat seems difficult, it is possible. Once you know how to introduce your pets correctly, the likelihood of your cat accepting the new puppy increases dramatically!

You May Like: Is Thieves Essential Oil Safe For Dogs

All the cats have unique characters and temperaments just as humans do, so expect aggressive behavior from their side at the first meeting. The best way to conduct a proper introduction for avoiding any mishap is to help them adjust well to each other.

If your older cat is aggressive to the new cat, then grab her attention at first. Gradually separate them from each other but do not punish the first one. Instead, make sure that each of the cat has access to their resources, essentials and space in the house.

Growling can occur from a variety of triggers. Some cats can be food or toy aggressive and growl to show possession. . . . Cats can also growl in the presence of other cats or dogs in order to establish dominance or signify they are not interested in interacting with the other animal, Dr. Gibbons explains.

Read Also: Is Bird's Nest Fern Toxic To Cats

We dont recommend leaving a kitten alone with a cat. Kittens need care and attention. If the adult cat is friends with the kitten and youre sure it wont hurt it when alone, you can leave them alone for a few hours.

If youre in doubt about leaving them alone, try not to do so. You can also keep the cats separated in different rooms when theyre alone, blocking all kinds of access. Such a strategy can also keep the kitten safe from the cat.

Angry Cat Hissing at new KittenDino cat

When bringing a new kitten home, its appealing to think that your older cat will automatically adopt this kitten as a new companion. Your older cat can show them the ropes and be a loving cuddle buddy. Nothing would warm your cat parents heart up more than you two furry friends playing together day after day.

Instead, your cat is not excited at this new arrival and shows this by hissing at the new kitten. Despite your disappointment that the two didnt hit it off immediately, this is normal cat behavior, and it can be rectified. There is a possibility that your two cats may not hit it off as best pals, but with your help, they can exist in the same home peacefully.

Lets discuss why your cat may not be the most obliging resident of your home and how to help them welcome your new kitten with open paws.

Also Check: Blue Buffalo Holistic Cat Food

Growling and hissing are your cats way of communicating that they want to be left alone. You might hear them hiss as you approach them, especially if you approach them too quickly. They might also growl or hiss at new pets or new children in the household as a way of setting boundaries and warning the new addition not to cross them! Although it can seem that your cat is hissing for no reason, that is rarely the case. If you or another person, or pet, ignore their warning, they will likely lash out by biting or scratching.

Your older is playing rough with your new kitten because they are depicting mock aggression. Some results have evidently shown that cats play roughly because of their breed attributes that is stalking, chasing and pouncing on each other.

This also shows that your cat is showing the 2nd type of rough play that is social play, where your cat tends to include playful bites during the whole play session.

First being solidarity play.

This should also be kept in mind that cats are born hunters. They take great deal of time to get used to people and also their fellow felines too.

Playing roughly isnt a sign that it might hurt your new kitten, its the way they have learnt being around each other.

Healthy play will follow once they will have a mutual inclination towards each other.

You May Like: Cat Heart Rate 240

If you have a new kitten, and an existing resident kitten they are likely to hiss when they first meet. This is because they do not know each other and establishing who is the dominant one and if the other kitten can be trusted.

This is regarded as normal but even if it is you still need to monitor them and its not recommended to leave them together unsupervised.

How do you even introduce cats?

- Begin with the cats entirely separate.
- Gradually expose each cat to the scent, sound and sight of the other cat. One sense at a time.
- Try to get each cat to associate the presence of the other cat with something positive.
- Avoid creating negative associations in these situations.

Read Also: Is Blue Buffalo Good Cat Food

The shy and fearful adult cat will require patience as he begins to build trust with his human caregiver. It is important he be given adequate time in his safe room before being introduced to larger portions of his new dwelling.

Human caregivers need to make sure areas where the cat may escape to be blocked off. Cats are masters at hiding. A particularly shy cat can remain out of sight for days if hiding spots are available.

Once the cat is secure in his safe room, it is your responsibility to gradually build trust and a positive relationship with him. A few tips:

- Always approach him at his level.
- Don't stare directly into his eyes rather, talk softly to him and offer a few slow blinks before turning away.
- Stay with him during feedings, so he associates you with positive things.
- Try to find toys that engage him. Play regularly and consistently when he is willing.
- Anytime a positive behavior or interaction occurs, offer treats, soft praise or an appropriate caress.

Most important, let him move at his own pace. If he isn't ready to be picked up, don't pick him up. If he is only comfortable having the sides of his face and chin rubbed, don't keep trying for a full-body caress.

This process may take several weeks to months. But the time will be well spent as your new cat begins to show signs of trust and affection, such as following you around the house, rubbing against your legs or arms, sitting next to you and sleeping near you.

Contrary to the myths, a mother cat can definitely live with her kittens even when they grow up if they live in the same house.

In fact, even if the cat has a new litter, she will allow the older offspring to nurse from her. Hence, a mother cat can definitely live with her kittens if they are taken care of properly.

You May Like: Can Humans Get Feline Distemper

Cats are highly territorial creatures as well and spread their pheromones by rubbing and urinating to claim an area as theirs. Suddenly having a new kitten in their home will make them feel extremely on edge. They will be able to smell your kitten's pheromones in your home and will feel as if their private and personal space is being taken away.

Territorial aggression is a real thing and can get pretty nasty. It is instinctive of the cat to hiss or even attack the person or animal that has invaded their space. I have had a cat biting and attacking me because of territorial aggression before, and it needs to be avoided where possible!

The best way to avoid this is to ensure your cat still has places and things that are theirs. For example, both cats should have their own litter box and food bowls. Even with measures like this, most cats will be reluctant to share the home at first and start hissing. However, within a week or so your cats will start to realize this new family member isn't too bad and tensions will ease.

You may think hissing in cats is a sign of hostility or animosity, but it's actually a normal way for cats to express fear.

The most common cause of hissing in cats is friction between two unneutered male cats, or between a male cat that's not neutered and a female cat that's not spayed that are looking for a potential mate.

Cats can also hiss at people. If your cat hisses when you or another person attempts to handle them, they likely feel threatened. Your cat may also hiss during a vet visit, perhaps while being restrained by the doctor or technicians.

While hissing is normal, it's a good idea to determine the cause so you can give your cat space and make changes to your cat's environment if they are scared or stressed. You should also always investigate excessive hissing with your veterinarian to make sure it's not your cat's way of telling you that they are in pain or that something else is wrong.

Cat hissing is a common behavior that sounds like the hiss of a snake or the sound of air leaking from a car tire. Feline behaviorists believe cats learned how to hiss by mimicking snakes as a survival technique in the wild.

When a cat hisses, they release a sudden burst of air through their mouth, which causes the hissing noise. If you're close enough to the cat's face, you can actually feel the air coming out of their mouth when they're hissing.

A hiss can also change based on the given situation. A hiss can range from a silent, open-mouth hiss that is more a visual sign of unhappiness, to an aggressive hiss with full-on spitting. Common behaviors that occur with hissing are:

- Mouth open with tongue curled
- Ears flattened
- Back arched
- Hairs standing on end (also called piloerection)

Sometimes a hiss may be confused with a growl. Growling and hissing are natural behaviors, and both help your cat to communicate. A hiss occurs with the mouth wide open and teeth showing. It is a forceful breath out, with a hard stop. A growl often starts with an “mmm” sound and then becomes low and long, with the sound originating in the throat.

Hissing is an expression of discomfort, fear, or stress. Some of the top reasons cat hiss include:

- Feeling threatened by or fearful of people
- Confrontation with other animals
- Protecting their kittens
- Being in an unfamiliar situation or meeting an unfamiliar animal
- Stress
- Physical pain or anticipation of pain
- Displeasure or annoyance

Cat hissing is more defensive than offensive, whether it’s directed at other animals or at humans. When your cat hisses, they are saying they need space from whatever they’re directing the hiss at.

Kittens also hiss sometimes from rough play. If another cat or another kitten is playing too rough, your kitten may hiss as a way of telling the other cat to stop. This play hiss is generally a shorter hiss than the defensive hiss of older cats. Your kitten might also respond to a sudden loud noise by jumping up and hissing, with all their fur standing on end.

Mother cats are very protective of their kittens. They will hiss when someone comes too close to them, whether it’s a person, another cat, or any other animal. Even the sweetest, most social cat will hiss during a calm interaction with their kittens.

Although cats can be extremely lovable and sweet, some breeds tend to have a somewhat feistier temperament, which can make them more likely to hiss:

- Siamese
- Sphynx
- Bombay
- Bengal
- Scottish Fold
- Pixie Bob
- Egyptian Mau
- American Wirehair
- Korat
- Singapura
- Cymric

Hissing is almost always a sign that a cat that feels mistreated, provoked, insecure, uncomfortable, threatened, or pressured in some way.

The common misconception is that the cat that hisses is teasing or taunting the other cat, dog, or person. In actuality, hissing is often a signal that the cat wants to avoid a physical confrontation. In cat-to-cat behavior, the cat that hisses regularly is almost always the victim or the one being chased or antagonized.

Common scenarios for cats to hiss at each other include:

- A female cat with a litter of kittens may hiss, growl, chase, swat, or try to bite another cat who approaches, even one she was formerly friendly with.
- Two unneutered male cats or an unneutered male and an intact female commonly hiss at each other when they are looking for mates.
- Cats are territorial and will hiss at other cats to assert dominance, especially when a new cat is introduced to their surroundings.
- After a trip to the vet, it is common for the returning cat to be picked on and hissed at by their housemates. Cats communicate through sight, sound, and scent.
- Cats will hiss to redirect aggression or when they anticipate pain.

Cats may also hiss at new kittens to establish boundaries, especially when the older cat's boundaries are being pushed. A hiss is a quick way for that older cat to tell the kitten to stop.

Socialization as a kitten is an important part of growing up. Kittens who don't have an opportunity to play and interact with littermates may exhibit more dominant behaviors because they didn't learn limitations or develop self-control.

If your cat is reacting to a big change like a new pet, make gradual, supervised introductions, and most of all, be patient. Give your cat a space in the house that's all their own so they can feel safe.

Even after your cat is well-acquainted with a new family member, they may still hiss and growl more than normal until they fully trust that they are safe around the new pet.

There are many reasons your cat might be hissing at your dog. In general, cats do not like confrontation with other animals, and hissing is a way to tell a possible aggressor to keep their distance. Hissing between dogs and cats can also be a territorial behavior when a new cat or dog is introduced to the family.

Your cat might hiss at you because they're annoyed with you. They may not want to be petted right then, or it may be because you're trying to pick them up when they don't want you to.

This type of hissing is also common if you have small children at home who don't know when to leave the cat alone. As with other cats, your cat may also hiss at you because they feel threatened or anticipate pain.

Here are some other things you may do to cause your cat to hiss:

- Trying to trim their nails or groom them
- Forcing your cat into a carrier for travel
- Having the smell of an unfamiliar dog or cat on you
- Vacuuming or using some other noisy household appliance

Hissing is a natural reaction to a situation; it's not something that your cat thinks about doing. It doesn't mean your cat dislikes you or that your cat is aggressive. It's a warning that your cat may have to resort to aggression if the perceived threat doesn't back off. Provoking a hissing cat will likely lead to scratching and biting.

Physical pain is one of the less common reasons for a cat to hiss. However, your cat might hiss if you are touching them in an area that hurts them. To determine whether a hiss is due to pain or simply fear, it's important to be observant and have your cat examined by your veterinarian.

Cats are sometimes upset by new or unfamiliar things, including people, objects, or changes in environment. This fear or discomfort can prompt hissing at what might appear to be nothing, but in reality, there is a real trigger.

You can ease their fear by slowly introducing and desensitizing them to a new home or new things in their home environment. With a little bit of time and love, your cat will start to feel comfortable.

In the short term, the safest thing to do is back away from a hissing cat to avoid getting scratched or bitten.

Here are some steps to follow:

1. Give them space and let them hide so they feel secure. Do not stare at your cat or try to hold them or comfort them.
2. Make sure your cat has plenty of escape routes from other animals/pets and places to hide. Cat condos, perches, cat trees, and other high spaces are perfect, as they allow them safe spots where they can calm down.
3. Give your cat time. Cats may take hours to calm down.
4. When they are calm, coax your cat out with food and/or catnip and positive reinforcement. Rewards like toys, treats, or canned food can sometimes help relieve the anxiety and stress associated with cat hissing.

If you're in doubt about what your cat's hissing means, or you see behavior that's out of the ordinary, schedule an appointment as soon as possible with your veterinarian for your cat to be examined.

A cat who hisses excessively and frequently should be evaluated by a veterinarian to rule out pain or discomfort. Other signs that your cat's hissing may be caused by a medical problem include:

- Poor appetite

- Low energy
- Reclusiveness (hiding) or other changes in behavior
- Hissing when you pet them in certain areas (possible pain)

If all medical issues have been ruled out, there are plenty of ways you can make your cat feel safe and at ease in their environment.

Give them time to acclimate to any new situation. Understanding your cat's triggers (like being bothered by the dog) will also help prevent unnecessary injuries.

Daily enrichment that uses physical and mental energy (e.g., interactive toys, catnip, hiding boxes, cat trees, window bird feeders, "kitty" TV, and even supervised outdoor activity) is great for helping decrease stress and anxiety in your cat.

Consider pheromone therapy, like Feliway classic plug-in diffuser and/or spray to assist with anxiety and stress, or Feliway Multi to help with multi-cat issues. Pheromone products should be used in a location where your cat spends most of their time. You can also try behavioral supplements like Solliquin or Composure.

You may also want to ask your vet for a recommendation for an animal behaviorist who specializes in helping people understand their pets' behavior. They can help analyze your specific situation and provide tactics to try to alleviate your cat's stress.

Featured Image: iStock.com/FatCamera