When buying a Glock it's important to first settle on which iteration—or generation—you're looking for.

First Gen Glockes were introduced in the mid-1980s. A basic, polymer pistol the first generation offered few features with a bare bones design.

In 1990, Second Generation Glockes made their way in the world and offered checkering on front and back straps while introducing a larger locking block.

Third Gen Glockes entered the picture in the late 1990s with a new look. This generation offered an accessory rail, thumb rests and finger grooves and a loaded chamber indicator. It's worth noting that in 2009, Glock introduced the Model 22 RTF2 into the Third Generation. This model, lumped into the Third Gen, delivered a pyramid grip texture and scalloped slide serrations.

In 2010, the Fourth Generation arrived with more aesthetic changes to the pistol like backstops, truncated pyramid grip texture, reversible mag release and changes to the barrel, slide, trigger bar and trigger housing. Glock followed this up in 2017 with the newest generation, the Fifth Generation. This iteration saw the removal of the finger grooves, a more rounded slide, flared magwell, ambidextrous slide stop and upgrades to the trigger and barrel.

As with any used gun, we recommend ensuring that the gun looks well cared of—that means no rust or caked-on gunk. If you can check the internals, ensure they too are free from rust. Also, make sure to see about any upgrades or additional accessories. Often times, prior owners will tweak the gun adding aftermarket sights or triggers and it's no uncommon for used Glockes to come with additional magazines and even holsters. All of this adds up as you're essentially getting more bang for your buck.
